A VISIT TO THE ROCK

Everybody wants to go to Alcatraz, because they've heard of it and because you see it when you're driving around. It's this little island with a prison sitting on top of it, it's quite intriguing. If it's a nice day, it's a beautiful ferry ride over with a gorgeous view of the skyline of San Francisco. When you get there, you get to go through the whole place. You go through the cells and see how they were set up. They talk about one of the famous escapes and how the prisoners made mannequins with papier-mâché heads. They show you solitary confinement, they show you the library, they show you where the guards stayed. They give you the whole experience. It's succinct and really well done."

HOLLYWOOD SIGN

The Hollywood Sign, which originally read HOLLYWOODLAND, was put up in 1923 as an advertisment for a new housing development in the Hollywood Hills. It was supposed to be taken down after about a year and a half, but as the movie business boomed during the Golden Age of Hollywood, the sign became a famous icon all over the world, and the decision was made to leave it up there permanently. In 1949, the Hollywood Chamber of Commerce decided to drop the "LAND" at the end, so the sign would reflect the district itself, rather than the Hollywoodland real estate development.
