A CITY OF MANY FIRSTS

When we visit Boston, I always emphasize how many firsts there were in the city. With the Boston Common, you have the first public park in the country. You have Boston Latin, which was the first high school in the country. In Cambridge, you have Harvard, which was the first university in the country. You have the first post office. You have the first public lending library. The first paper money was used in Boston. The first subway in the country. The first marathon, the first World Series. There are dozens more. Boston is where many elements of American culture really began.

STATUE OF LIBERTY

It took more than 10 years to raise enough money to complete the Statue of Liberty. Funds were raised by first building the statue’s head and setting it down in the middle of Paris—and then charging people to go up to the top of the head and look out on the panoramic views of the city. Around the same time, the statue’s arm and torch were sent to America and set up in the middle of Madison Square Park; the public was charged to go up for views of all of New York. At the time, that was the tallest point in the city.
